Athens—ruins of the Parthenon—the Acropolis—temple of Theseus—the oldest of Athenian antiquities—burial-place of the son of Miaulis—reflections on standing where Plato taught, and Demosthenses harrangued—Bavarian sentinel—Turkish mosque, crected within the sanctuary of the Parthenon—wretched habitations of the modern Athenians.

John Adams, which had come to anchor under our stern the evening of our arrival at Egina. The day is like every day of the Grecian summer, heavenly. The stillness and beauty of a new world lie about us. The ships steal on with their clouds of canvass just filling in from the lofty temple crowning the mountain on our lee, whose shining columns shift slowly as we pass; we the ruins; upon this sight, I could not but presently istence. think within myself, 'alas! how do we poor mortals fret and vex ourselves if any of our friends happen to I have seldom felt. The morning breeze had died away,

Can this be Athens? Are these the same isles and mountains Alcibiades saw, returning with his victorious galleys from the Hellespont; the same that faded on the long gaze of the con-gled its murmur with so much sweet philosophy, was queror of the Salamis ; leaving his ungrateful country for exile; the same that to havee seen, for a Roman, was to be complete as a man; the same whose proud dames were the golden grasshopper in their hair, as a boasting tokenthat they had sprung from the soil; the olives in all its poetic glory. The "Altar of Love" same where Pericles nursed the arts, and Socrates and Plato taught "humanity," and Epicurus walked with his disciples, looking for truth? What an offset are these

The city is five miles in the interior, and the "arms of turning to Athens. Athens," as the extending walls were called, stretched in the times of the republic from the Acropolis to the Klepsydra or water-clock of Athens, in returning to the sea. The Piraeus, now nearly a deserted port, with a hotel. The Eight Winds sculptured on the octagonal few wretched houses, was then a large city. It wants side, are dressed according to their temperatures, six of Five miles more sacred in history than those between turning from the plains with a gun on his shoulder, led and live there like beasts. The fineness of the climate as through the narrow streets of the modern town to a makes a roof almost unnecessary for eight months in attractive circumstance to me was some honey from the missionaries, have tolerable houses, but the paths Hymettus, brought us to bed-time.

We were standing under the colonades of the temple a precipice, would ever pick his way through the of Theseus, the oldest and the best preserved of the an- streets. tiquities of Athens, at an early honr. We walked around it in wonder. The sun that threw inward the shadows of its beautiful columns, had risen on that eastern porch for more than two thousand years, and it is still the transcendent model of the world. The Parthenon was a copy of it. The now venerable and ruined temples of Rome, were built in its proportions when it was already an antiquity. The modern editices of every civilized nation are considered faulty only as they non was a copy of it. The now venerable and ruined Brick, &c. depart from it. How little dreamed the admirable Grecian, when its proportions rose gradually to his patient thought, that the child of his teeming imagination would be so immortal!

The situation of the Theseion has done much to preserve it. It stands free of the city, while the Parthenon and the other temples of the Acropolis, being within the citadel, have been battered by every assailant, from the Venetian to the ikonoklast and the Turk. It looks at a little distance like a modern structure, its parts are so nearly perfect. It is only on coming close to the

We passed a handsome portico, standing alone amid a heap of ruins. It was the entrance to the ancient a heap of ruins. It was the entrance to the ancient Agora. Here assembled the people of Athens, the constituents and supporters of Pericles, the first possessors of these god-like temples. Here were sown, in the ears of the Athenians, the first seeds of glory and sedition, by patriots and demagogues, in the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Here were it first vehicles of the stirring days of Platza and Marathon. Platæa and Marathon. Here was it first whispered eral. that Aristides had been too long called "the just," and that Socrates corrupted the youth of Athens. And, for a lighter thought, it was here that the wronged wife of Alcibiades, compelled to come forth publicly and sign Alcibiades, compelled to come forth publicly and sign her divorce, was snatched up in the arms of her brilstreet.

N. B. Account books made to any desirable pattern, at ian 3 forgiving him, woman-like, with but half a repentance. The feeling with which I read the story when a boy, is strangely fresh in my memory. We harried on to the Acropolis. The ascent is winding and difficult, and, near the gates, encumbered to per yard. with marble rubbish. Volumes have been written on with marble rubbish. Volumes have been written on the antiquities which exist still within the walls. The greater part of four unrivalled temples are still lifted to the sun by this tall rock in the centre of Athens, the majestic Parthenon, visible over half Greece, towering above all. A Bavarian soldier received our passport at the gate. He was resting the butt of his musket on a saperb bas-relief, a fragment from the ruins. How must the blood of a Greek boil to see a barbarian thus

We stood under the portico of the Parthenon, and looked down on Greece. Right through a broad gap in the mountains and looked the parthenon of set to guard the very sanctuary of his glory. in the mountains, as if they had been swept away that Athens might be seen, stood the shining Acropolis of Corinth. I strained my eyes to see Diogenes lying under the walls, and Alexander standing in his sunshine. "Sea-born Salamis," was beneath me, but the "ships by thousands" were not there, and the king had yanished from his "rocky throne" with his "men and nations." Ægina lay far down the gulf, folded in its blue mist, and I strained my sight to see Aristides wan-dering in exile on its shore. "Mars Hill" was within the sound of my voice, but its Areopagus was deserted of its judges, and the intrepid apostle was gone. The rostrum of Demosthenes, and the academy of Plato, and the banks of the Ilissus, where Socrates and Zeno taught, were all around me, but the wily orator, and Egean Sea.—We got under way this morning, and stood towards Athens, followed by the sloop of war the philosopher "on whose infant lips the bees shed honey as he slept," and he whose death and doctrine have been compared to those of Christ, and the selfdenying stoic, were alike departed. Silence and ruin brood over all!

I walked through the nave of the Parthenon, passing a small Turkish mosque, (built sacrilegiously by the the light breeze of the Egean, and withdrawing the eye former Disdar of Athens, within its very sanctuary,) and mounted the south-eastern rampart of the Acropolis. Through the plain beneath ran the classic Ilissus, and could believe ourselves asleep on the sea. I have been on its banks stood the ruins of the temple of Jupiter repeating to myself the beautiful reflection of Servius Olympus, which I had distinguished with the glass in Sulpitius, which occurs in his letter of condolence to coming up the Egean. The Ilissus was nearly dry, Cicero, on the death of his daughter, written on this but a small island covered with verdure divided its wavery spot. * "On my return from Asia," he says, "as ters a short distance above the temple, and near it I was sailing from Egina towards Megara, I began to were distinguishable the foundations of the Lyceum. contemplate the prospect of the countries around me .- Aristotle and his Peripatetics ramble there no more. WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1834. tempt to shield themselves under the plea that Gen. Jackson is unpopular here. This state is a part of the confederacy, and so long as she is, she cannot expect to be humored in all her waywardness, and gratified in all her fretful and petulant antipathies. To say nothing of their absolute adulation of Gen Jackson, one year ago, it is sufficient that he commands the love and respect of a large portion, a vast majority of this nation, and that they were gratified, and had a right to be gratified, in seeing a public ship decorated with the effigy of one who has done so much, and is still at work for the glory and welfare of his country. This consideration, alone, ought to have restrained their Vandal hand and spirit, but it did not. The deed has been perpetrated—the whole nation, and each individual member thereof has been insulted; its dignity outraged, not merely by the miscreant who crept upon the bows of the ship, and mutilated her under the darkness and secrecy of the night, but by those yet more infamous, who move in the first walks of life, and openly justify, if they did not plan and pay for the crime. What will be the consequence? That is wrapped in futurity and none can tell-but it requires not the gift of prophecy to tell the tendency.-When the law is broken down, and violence succeeds to its reign, one act of violence begets another. If the public feeling is outraged by acts, like the one of which we are now speaking, the offspring of party folly and wickedness, and justified in the madness of factious zeal, retaliation follows, and the men of property finally editor, who does not usually rise early, was up at half good principles, who like themselves may take the law in the House of Correction. into their own hands, and fire the bank, or the large factories in revenge? Those people are not, naturally, more ferocious than individuals of other nations. It is the dental of justice at the legal tribunals-the substitution of violence for law, they take the law into their own hands. and their annals are constantly stained by blood which follows the assassin's dagger. Human nature is not different here—the like causes will produce the like effects; and if Lowell, or Dover, or Sommersworth, or the Bank, or their India ships, were destroyed, as the Figure Head was, the sufferers would have only the poor consolation of reflecting that there were those, bad and wicked enough to follow the example, which, if these citizens had not set them, they had justified before them. The Government, too, consulting, as they ought, their own dignity, and the feelings of the nation, would be justified in repairing the public ships at ports where the people's Drowned .- Coroner Shute held an inquest yesterday upon the body of Daniel E. Morse, who was found drowned in the Mill Creek, about 4 o'clock yesterday morning. It appeared that Moore and Patrick Carroll, being excellent swimmers, ventured, in sport, into the water with their clothes on, on Monday night, but after flourishing round some time, Moore found himself so much encumbered by his clothing as to lose all hopes of reaching the shore without aid, and finally sank with the name of Patrick on his lips, whose assistance he was imploring. After the melancholy termination of this boyish frolic, Carroll repaired to his home, and procured a number of friends, who commenced, but without success, a general search for the body of Moore.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify, that we were present at the experiment made by Mr Knapp, on Saturday, the 10th inst., with a Mattrass, filled with grated cork, to sustain a person on the water, from the Castle to Long wharf, which proved successfull to our utmost satisfaction. We are happy to state that we are perfectly satisfied as it respects its property in securing persons from shipwreck as intended. We do increfore recommend their use, particularly to mariners, and venture to say, that their introduction on board of vessels, will prove highly important and valuable hereafter.
